Drawing on a photo-elicitation study, I explore tensions between men’s everyday and biomedical practices of care. My analysis reveals practices of “caring masculinity” which interact with traditional patterns in men’s multi-faced care practices. This highlights the importance of the mundane in healthcare and acknowledges the complex patterns of masculinity in health and illness.